To spot a fake ESA letter, the primary way is to ascertain the essential details that go in a genuine and legitimate maltipoo letter.

If someone wants to own an emotional support animal then they have to possess an emotional support letter from a licensed mental health practitioner. To ensure the legitimacy of the letter people can look up to an emotional support letter online to check whether their letter has all the necessary elements included.

Remember! A legitimate ESA letter is only written on a professional letterhead. It is personally signed by an authentic and certified mental health practitioner. You may hit rock bottom in the event of being separated from your only source of validation and happiness if you have a fake ESA letter. The letter must have the name of the applicant. In the letter there must be a confirmation statement from the mental health practitioner that the patient is suffering from any mental, psychological, or emotional disorder. Here, another thing is mandatory and that is specific medical terminology. Proper contact information of the mental health practitioner must be in the letter. If there is a stamp with the mental health practitioner's name, it should not be smudged and must be clear.

Authorities need to see the therapist in an official capacity. The emotional support animal store owners or anyone who is interested in lending an individual animal needs to see the official document of the therapist. If social media handles of the therapist are inserted in the letter, it may cause problems to the applicant. Finally, some other things that need to be mentioned are as follows:

- the jurisdiction of the therapist must also be mentioned which is the state in which he or she is practicing
- type and breed of the bird or animal which has qualified as an ESA
- Date on which the letter has been issued
- Signature of the therapist

With a genuine ESA letter, patients can expand their rights in terms of travel, housing, and employment. If individuals have genuine sheepadoodle letters instead of fake ones, their rights are protected under three different types of acts. These acts include, Americans with Disabilities Act, Fair Housing Act, and the Air Carrier Access Act.
