

Standard Length of an Annotated Bibliography – Guide

Writing a document, essay, annotated bibliography, or anything else is not easy if you do not know its basics. Every written document has a specific pattern and set of rules required to be followed to craft the perfect (in terms of style) document.

Just as writing has many types and styles, essays have too. There are different essays used for different topics and at different times. If you do not know about that, you can surely hire a reliable essay writing service to help you get started with it. Similarly, annotated bibliography has different types too and comes with certain specifications.

An annotated bibliography is important in the world of writing. We know it is important to give credit where it's due, and a bibliography performs that task. It is used to cite the sources you have used throughout your document. An annotated bibliography is a bit different as it is more detailed. It is not merely the link of the article or book etc., but a detailed description of the source.

As I mentioned earlier, annotated bibliography has multiple types; they include descriptive, analytical, and critical bibliographies. But the main question arises: how long should one annotated bibliography be? If you don't know the answer, don't worry, my friend, I have got you covered here.

The standard length of an annotated bibliography can differ and depend on the purpose to write my paper. The annotated bibliography can be of only a couple of sentences to a couple of pages. It differs from annotation to annotation; you don't have to overstress yourself about this.

The length of the annotated bibliography can depend on the following factors:

- ❖ The purpose of your annotation. For instance, if it's descriptive, then you explain what the author wrote? What are the arguments? What topics were covered in this piece of writing? What is the main point of this article or book? All that in summarized form.

- ❖ The length depends on how many details you want to include. If you summarize every event or point covered in that book, it will take more space or pages to complete.
- ❖ If you are just summarizing your sources, then definitely the annotation won't be that long. If you are also explaining them side by side, then it will take up more space. Extensive analysis always includes teeny-tiny bits and covers more pages, of course.
- ❖ If you want your annotation to be a long one, then you can first present a general summary of that piece of literature/writing. After that, you can fit in several sentences telling how this work relates to your project or research paper. That will cover up more space as well as clearly define how it helped you in your research and writing part.
- ❖ The average length of an annotated bibliography is 150 words. If you want it short, then the average length is 4-5 sentences only. It all depends on you and your purpose of writing that annotation.
- ❖ The length also depends on the intended audience of the annotated bibliography.
- ❖ One thing you should keep in mind is that no matter how long or short your annotated bibliography is, it should be complete sentences or brief paragraphs.
- ❖ Writing this is not that hard after all. However, you can still contact a free essay writer to write my paper for me . Essay writers are professionals, and they follow the proper channel to do anything, but taking their guidance if you are new to it and then doing it on your own is always a great approach.

If you keep in mind the above-mentioned factors for the length of the annotated bibliography, then you won't exceed the word limit. So always follow the proper rules. Good luck!

Other Useful Resources :

An Easier and Reliable Way to Get Your Essay Done

8 Types of Essays and their Requirements

A Guide to Write an Argumentative Essay